Presenters: Jason Kliwinski and Lia Nielsen, Green Building Center

Many are familiar with the LEED (Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design) rating system for major renovations, new construction and existing buildings. LEED has been helping clients reduce environmental impacts while improving human health for two decades. Certification is not easy and significant documentation is required to achieve it at any level.

LEED for Campus provides a way to get groups of pre-requisites and credits preapproved across your portfolio related to the sustainability of your campus so that any individual building project can use them in the future on a certification without having to submit any additional information. Similarly, the WELL Building Standard offers a Portfolio Program and a condensed version through the WELL Health and Safety Certification. While LEED focuses more heavily on reducing carbon footprint, WELL focuses specifically of the impact of the built environment on human health and well-being, In a post-Covid world, this is equally as important as reducing Climate Change impacts.

This session will give an overview of the LEED for Campus Approach, WELL Portfolio and WELL Health and Safety Certifications, how they may help increase the sustainability of your portfolio and the benefits to using these frameworks to manage your campus sustainably.

Presenter: Karen Rossilli-Kiefer, FMP, Michael P. Zulla, CEFM, Lia Acevedo, and Kelly Dall, AISD, from TeamPar

This presentation will leave Directors with an understanding of what the five pillars of Student Centric Design are (and can mean to their university) and why the incorporation of these principles into the built environment will engage students and promote on-site learning. You will leave with a better understanding of these learning objectives:

1. Placemaking Design - How to design incorporating color theory, community, and culture.
2. Importance of classroom mobility and collaborative spaces and the psychological impacts of each.
3. Biophilic Design - The emotional and performance benefits of bringing the outdoors inside.
4. The Multiple Intelligence Classroom- how design can facilitate many learning opportunities.
5. Acoustical Impacts of the built environment – how to design and build with IIC/STC ratings and ambient noise reduction in mind.
